30: Model 1840 Harpers Ferry Rifle Musket

USD 15,000 - 20,000

Extremely rare Harpers Ferry Model 1840 flintlock caliber .69 musket with silver inlay. Probably a prototype model 1840 that Harpers Ferry was considering producing but never did. Only Springfield Armory produced approximately 30,000 of which most were converted to percussion. This musket has a 42" brown barrel (Springfield was finished bright) with bayonet lug on top at the muzzle, and iron furniture having three bands retained by springs. Lock plate is 6-1/4" long, slightly curved with a pointed tail and beveled edges. It is marked with a small American eagle over a tiny "US?" in front of the hammer and "HARPERS / FERRY / 1840?" vertically behind the hammer. The top of the barrel is marked "V/P?" and eagle head proofs. There is a button shaped head ramrod in the channel. The musket was later embellished with 6 inlaid silver stars (3 on each side) along with a finely designed eagle with nameplate. There were very few ever created and extremely few of those are known today. Dimensions: 42" Barrel, 58" Overall

Dimensions: 28.5" Blade, 34" Overall

45: Solingen Short Sword

USD 500 - 800

This is a W. K. & C Solingen blade, short sword or gentleman's sword from the period 1885 to 1890 with original scabbard. Although this is German-manufactured, it appears to derive its form more from the pattern for 1888 from The Pattern Book of Matthew Bolton's Sword Hilt's English court fashion of the day. The combined King's Head and Knights Head signature appears on the Ricasso, along with the initials W.K.&C. The Pommel and other parts surrounding the hilt are intricately carved in relief, the blade has attractive designs. The whole is a very well balanced and intricate presentation of a short sword. One side of the cross guard is delicately hinged so that it folds flat when the sword is worn at the side of the body. Dimensions: 32" Blade, 38" Overall

73: Katar Hindu Push Blade

This 18th Century Katar is one of the oldest and most characteristic of the Indian hand-to-hand combat weapons. The handle sides were also used to block attacks. Because of the nature of the weapon, attacks were mainly direct thrusts that would easily pierce the enemies' armor with a single but strong blow, possible because of the light weight and amazing attack speeds that could be achieved. The use of poisons was another deadly way of increasing the Katara's effectivity in battle. Katar's ceased to be in common use in the 19th century. The handle is made up of two parallel bars connected by two cross pieces. The blade is double-edged and straight. Dimensions: 19" Overall
